Europe has never been more coveted, even with continued Russian aggression at its borders and amidst global economic uncertainty. The report finds that nearly half of global destination preference now points to Europe, up from 41% last year. Yet the research also reveals a widening disconnect between what cities deliver and what the world believes about them. That gap is no longer a branding issue alone. Resonance found the correlation between performance and perception is just 0.54, creating a high-stakes advantage for cities that can align infrastructure, policy and lived experience with a credible narrative for investors, employers, talent and visitors.

"Europe's leading cities are turning disruption into a forcing function for progress," says Jeremie Feinblatt, Principal at Resonance Consultancy. "The perception gap is now a balance sheet issue. It influences investor shortlists, employer confidence and visitor spend," he notes.

"The winners are pairing investment in the basics people feel every day, housing, mobility, public realm and safety, with a narrative that proves those gains in the marketplace. Cities that can't align reality and reputation will fall behind in the competition for people and capital."

The Top 10 Europe's Best Cities for 2026

Why this year's ranking matters for city leaders

Europe's Best Cities 2026 lands at a moment when city strategy is being rewritten in real time.

"Cities that are improving quality of life while staying connected and discoverable will keep climbing," says Jason McGrath, EVP and Head of U.S. Corporate Reputation at Ipsos, the report's consumer research partner. "The most competitive places are the ones people can picture themselves living in, visiting soon, and building a career in."

What the Top 3 cities reveal about the new European playbook

Beyond the Top 3, the report documents a clear shift: the urban story is no longer owned only by the usual capitals. More secondary and emerging cities are rising alongside the global powerhouses, often faster to build, more cost-competitive and hungry for growth.

How the ranking was built

Europe's Best Cities is powered by Resonance's proprietary Place Power Score, combining performance and perception across three pillars: Livability, Lovability, and Prosperity.

For 2026, Resonance evaluated metropolitan areas with populations over 500,000 using 47 metrics across 33 subcategories, plus user-generated signals from major online platforms and Ipsos perception research. Ipsos surveyed 5,000 people across 10 European countries on the cities they most want to live in, visit soon, and where they believe the best job opportunities exist.

Climate risk inputs are powered by AlphaGeo. The ranking excludes Russian cities, as it has since 2022.
