AMSTERDAM, March 27, 2026 /PRNewswire/ - Destinus has been named to Fast Company's annual list of the World's Most Innovative Companies of 2026, recognizing organizations that are redefining industries through measurable impact and execution.

The real constraint in European defense today is not innovation, but industrial capacity. Modern warfare is defined by the ability to produce, deploy, and iterate systems at scale under real conditions.

Destinus is building a European industrial model designed for this reality - focused on scalable strike and air defense systems, rapid integration, and repeatable production across multiple sites. Its systems are engineered to move from development to deployment in compressed timelines, with manufacturing, autonomy, and integration designed as a single architecture from the outset.

"Europe doesn't have a technology problem in defense. It has an industrial problem," said Oleksandr Danylyuk, President of Destinus. "The ability to produce at scale and deploy fast is what defines capability today. That is what we are building - systems that can be manufactured, integrated, and fielded with speed and consistency."

By combining a unified autonomy stack, vertically integrated engineering, and distributed European manufacturing capacity, Destinus is closing the gap between prototype and scalable production - a gap that continues to limit the effectiveness of many advanced defense programs.

Fast Company's Most Innovative Companies list is one of its flagship editorial franchises, highlighting organizations that translate bold ideas into real-world capability and impact.

The full list of honorees is available at fastcompany.com and will appear in print beginning March 31, 2026.
